TEA CULTIVATION IN JAPAN.

Some days since we printed some practical remarks upon the intention of many Japanese, and some foreign tea merchants to prepare black tea: this season, for export to England, as it is supposed that in future London will be a good market for Japanese Congou. We hear that someforeign tea-tasters agree with our opinions, and hold, as we do, that for many sufficient reasons the English market will not take the Japanese tens at any rate, neither in large quantities nor at good prices. Further inquiry into the matter leads us to believe that shipments, unless anon a merely experimental scale, are more likely to yield loss than profit, as the taste of Englis onsumers stendily favors Indian teas; so much so, that even the stronger sorts of China teasthe Ningchows. Oopacks, and new growth of Ishang black leaf sorts-are at disadvantage on account of the want of strength when compared to the full flavored Assam leaves. How then will room be found, or favour nocorded to the weak Congous of Japan, whose flavour resembles at best new mown hay and water? The shipmonts if on a large scale. will not answor, and the dealers and shippers will do well to keep to the American market, till even the American consumers get tired of the too large proportion of doctored stuff which is now ent from this and the southern ports. The Japanese government would perhaps do well to import some Assam ten plants which might after a time, restore the Japanese tea trees, which soem to us to be worn out and losing vitality, sequence of the different mobility of soldiers and which can only be restored by judicious mixing. Any tea taster will have noticed how quickly the Japan cured leaf becomes not only soft, but putrid. The reason is that the trees are overworked, the constant picking of the leaves in jures the trees, and as was the case with the mulberry trees in Europe, under similar conditions, we may before long see a failure of the tea crop in this country. The matter deserves the attention of the government, and a few thousand dollars might be well laid out to invigorate th effete plantations of Japan, the tes trade being of such great importance and value Japan
